Hong Kong Liminal: Situation as Method

Meaghan Morris

When this rollback [of untransformed Western values] takes place, we must have our own cultural values. And yet perhaps those values do not already exist, in substantive form. Rather I suspect that they are possible as method, that is to say, as the process of the subject's self-formation. This I have called 'Asia as method', and yet it is impossible to definitively state what this might mean'.

Takeuchi, Yoshimi, 'Asia as Method'¹.

It is in its imaginative aspect, rather than its success or failure, that [the 2014 Hong Kong Umbrella Movement] needs discussion, for it is also on this plane that Hong Kong becomes conceptually unique. ... Hong Kong's struggles for self-determination appear to be taking us into a political zone for which there may well be no historical equivalent for the questions raised

Tight spots: Golden Chicken historiography

On the last day of June in 2046, an elderly woman with startlingly smooth, radiant skin struggles up an incline through the lush foliage of Victoria Peak. She is escorted by two police officers and all three are dressed in white. We soon see that everyone in this future wears white. This will be the last day of the Hong Kong Special Administrative Region (HKSAR), and the end of the historical era of 'one country two systems' that began on July 1st, 1997. Yet the scene is peaceful and ordinary, with dogs and children playing and joggers passing by. Not much seems to have changed on the Peak from the time of the '2003' city
